Start with what you already have

Bring a summary or build a short brief, then choose how to search. Both starting points work with either route. No AI, custom agent or employer list is required.

Use an existing summary

Reuse your experience and preferences summary from an earlier conversation or your own notes. In the starter, choose “I have a summary” and paste it. You do not need to copy it into separate fields.

Build a short brief

Choose “Help me build my brief”. Start with the work or roles that interest you and where you would work. Add relevant experience and scope when useful. Possible titles help you search; the responsibilities in the full description tell you whether a role belongs.

Your short search brief

Work I want to explore: [responsibilities or directions]
Where I would work: [location or remote region]
Relevant experience: [short summary, if available]
Must meet: [firm requirements, if any]
Would prefer: [choices that could flex]
Optional starting points: [titles, sources, employers or saved openings]

Choose how to search

- Search yourself: prepare a manual plan, open its search links and follow page 3. If you pasted a summary, add a short work direction and location for the query links. The page cannot extract them automatically.
- Use your own AI: prepare and copy the prompt, then paste and send it to an assistant with current web access. Your summary alone is enough to prepare the prompt. Page 2 also has a prompt you can copy directly.

Keep the first search simple

You can start without choosing every title, source or employer. A requirement must be met; a preference can trade off. Keep unclear conditions unconfirmed. The starter prepares instructions and query links; you or your chosen assistant run the search. Keep confidential work and other people’s private information out of anything you share.

Open the Job Search Starter

Ask your AI to run a first search

Send this prompt with your summary or brief to an assistant with current web access. The starter can prepare it for you. If the assistant cannot browse, use page 3.

Copy this prompt and add your starting point

Use my summary or search brief below to find current openings. Start from the responsibilities, experience and scope I describe. Propose a few plausible role or title variants and explain why they fit the search. Treat them as directions to test against actual descriptions.

Ask about missing details that would materially change the search; otherwise mark them unknown and proceed. Distinguish firm requirements from preferences. Do not invent experience or treat an unmentioned skill as a missing ability.

Search employer careers pages, relevant broad and specialist job boards, and the wider web. Discover suitable sources if I have not named any. Include saved openings, alerts and recruiter leads I provide, but do not assume access to my accounts. Choose a manageable scope and report it.

Find each promising vacancy on the employer's site. Read the full description and check whether applications are open. Save the employer link, job ID if available, discovery source and date checked. Separate leads you cannot verify and explain what remains unchecked.

Explain relevance using actual responsibilities and scope. Exclude only confirmed failures of my firm requirements, showing why. Keep unclear conditions visible. Report pay as posted and state whether it is base, total or hourly; do not guess bonus or equity.

Combine duplicate copies of the same vacancy, retaining different jobs at one employer. Include still-active saved openings I provide, and distinguish new, repeated and changed results where history allows. Keep applied or declined roles separate. If history is unavailable, say so.

Return employer, title, posting link, responsibilities, location and work arrangement, posted pay and basis, reason to investigate, unknowns and next action. End with sources checked, sources you could not access and useful search terms. Distinguish no relevant results from an incomplete or failed search. Do not apply or contact anyone.

MY SUMMARY OR BRIEF:
[Paste your starting point here.]

Check the work behind the result

Open a few employer links yourself. Check the responsibilities, scope and conditions against your brief. A relevant search result is a lead to investigate; before preparing an application, compare the exact job's requirements with your actual experience.

Keep what helps

Tell the assistant which results were useful and why others missed. Ask for an updated brief reflecting changes you accept. Keep that brief, useful sources and results available for the next search.

Search yourself and improve the next search

Use the same brief without AI. Start with a few searches, read promising postings and adjust from what you find. A notes document is enough.

Try work terms and title variants

For project coordination, try “project coordinator [location] jobs” and “program coordinator [location] careers”. If those miss the work, try a responsibility phrase such as “project scheduling [location] jobs”. Read the descriptions; titles are starting points.

Look in several places

Use broad web search or a job board alongside employer careers pages and a relevant specialist or local board. Try “[field] job board [location]” to find sources. Include saved openings, alerts and roles people send you. LinkedIn can be one source.

Check and keep promising openings

Find the same vacancy on the employer’s site. Read the full description and check whether applications are open. Keep unverified leads labeled for follow-up. Combine duplicate listings of one vacancy. Before preparing an application, check its requirements against your actual experience.

Employer / role / job ID: [details]
Employer posting: [direct link]
Found through / checked on: [source / date]
Relevant work and scope: [why investigate]
Location, arrangement and posted pay: [details and pay basis]
Requirements and unknowns: [what is confirmed or needs checking]
Next action: [investigate, apply or pass]

Use the results to improve the search

Note what was useful, what missed and why. Adjust terms or sources; do not silently turn a preference into a requirement. If results keep missing the work, revisit role directions against your experience. With AI, ask it to propose changes and save the ones you accept.

Carry the useful parts forward

Keep your latest agreed brief, useful sources and results together for next time. Include still-active saved openings and note applications or passes so they do not reappear as new leads. Provide that context in a new chat; do not assume AI remembers it. Later agreed changes take precedence over stale starter fields.

Repeat a search that works for you

Use saved searches, alerts or a reminder. If your AI supports scheduled browsing, ask it to repeat the tested search with your current brief on chosen days, at a time and time zone. Confirm that the task exists, where results arrive and that the first run worked. The starter cannot create a schedule. A failed or incomplete run is different from no matches. Recheck postings before acting; pause alerts or tasks when your search ends.

Example: official ChatGPT scheduling instructions